Lez Zeppelin: man those girls can rock

Pat Jamieson

Issue date: 3/8/07 Section: A&E

After what seemed like an endless week, I went to check out the highly publicized Lez Zeppelin concert. Put on by the Bentley Music Society and the sophomore class cabinet, I was interested to see if these girls had the skills to cover the masterpieces of one of rock's greatest bands ever.

If I had any reservations about what I was about to experience, they were left at the door. I couldn't believe what I was hearing. It was as if Led Zeppelin were resurrected and playing their hearts out in La Cava. As a musician and an avid listener of the band, I paid close attention to the skill and detail that the girls were putting into the songs. It was clear after listening to a few tunes that they were not only extremely talented, but that they were polished as well.

Lez Zeppelin rocked out at LaCava.

While any group can pick up their instruments and play a Zeppelin song, these girls seemed to emit the very essence of the late band. The lead singer Sarah McLellan was a large part of what I liked about the performance. Not only was her pitch always perfect, but her energy was addicting and forced you to sit up and take notice. Although there was only about 40-60 people in the audience, it seemed as though she was singing to a sold out arena. The guitarist Steph Paynes really impressed me. If you had ever wondered how Jimmy Page played, you need not look any further. When it came time for the solo in "Dazed and Confused," she was right there with her bow playing the devil out of her Les Paul. Perhaps the greatest moment in the show came when I heard the sweet riff of "Moby Dick." As the other musicians exited the stage and the drummer Helen Destroy began the intense solo section, everyone seemed to be in awe. It was "the greatest drum solo I've seen live," recounted Nathan Pullen.

All in all it was a great event and I would personally like to thank and give credit to the Bentley Music Society for organizing this and future events. Often times at a business school, the passion for music can get lost. It is great to see an organization keeping rock alive!
